

Flora, the manager of Silver Street Farm, knew she had to leave; her father had broken his leg and needed her help back on their family farm. But actually leaving the city farm was very hard. She had been sitting half in and half out of her van for ten minutes now.

“Och, dear!” she exclaimed, her Scots accent even stronger than usual. “Are you sure you’ll be OK?”

Meera, Karl and Gemma, the three children who had started Silver Street Farm, tried to reassure her.

“We’ll be fine!” said Meera, doing her best to sound as convincing as possible.

“We’ve got Squirt and Bish Bosh to help,” said Gemma.

“I will be here, also,” added Karl’s Auntie Nat in her strong Russian accent. She had rushed to Silver Street to be the “supervising adult” so Flora could leave.

“It’s only for a few days, isn’t it?” said Gemma, managing to keep the worry out of her voice.

“Oh, yes!” said Flora. “Just until my brother gets home at the weekend. But it’s such bad timing...”

“No, it’s good timing...” said Karl, doing the best job of all of them at sounding calm.

“It’s half-term this week, so we can all be here,
all of the time.”

“But I’ll miss the Lonchester Cheese Show tomorrow!” Flora complained.

“Don’t worry about that, Flora. You’ve left me instructions about what to do,” said Meera, hoping she sounded confident.

Flora was still looking worried.

“But all the animals!” she said anxiously.
“They’re about to give birth any day now and I haven’t finished making new homes for them all!”

“But you’re always saying how you can never be absolutely sure when babies will be born,” Karl reassured her.

“And they all might be late!” Meera chipped in.

“We can finish making new pens for the mums and babies,” said Gemma, as brightly as possible.

Flora smiled back at last. “You’ll be fine, won’t you?” she said.

The children nodded and exchanged a quick phew-we’ve-convinced-her look.

“Right, then,” said Flora, putting both feet in the van for the first time. “The sooner I go, the sooner I’ll be back. Where’s that dog of mine? Flinty! Flinty!”

Flinty the sheepdog came waddling across the yard and clambered over Flora’s lap to take her place in the passenger seat.

“Goodness!” exclaimed Flora. “She’s getting heavy! Diet for you when we get back, my girl!”

Flora slammed the van door shut and started the engine.

“I don’t know why I’m worrying,” she said through the window. “This is your farm, after all. See you at the weekend!”

Shading their eyes against the bright spring sunshine, Auntie Nat and the children smiled and waved as Flora pulled away and disappeared into the traffic at the end of the road.

Then Auntie Nat turned to the children with her hands on her hips. “Now you tell me truths,” she said. “You really think we’ll be fine?”

“Well...” said Gemma, “Bish Bosh has been grounded and Squirt’s got such a crush on Meera that he can’t do anything but wander around after her like a shadow.”

“Yeah,” said Meera, shaking her head in disapproval. “And the only grown-up who’s free this week is you, Auntie Nat.”

“But the really bad news is that I don’t think the piglets are going to be at all late,” said Karl. “In fact, I’m pretty sure that at least one litter will be born today.”

There was a short pause when no one said a thing. Then Auntie Nat spoke. “OK,” she said. “You go look at pigs. I make tea. Also biscuits.”
