

“There really is nobody quite like Almond writing in children’s or adult’s fiction today.”

The Times

“A funny, tender tale from the master of contemporary storytelling.”

Publishing News

“Polly Dunbar draws the cast of eccentric characters with panache ... Almond’s writing is zesty and full of humour.”

Irish Times

“This beautiful book ... will make children laugh while encouraging them to believe in themselves and others and to tolerate strangeness.”

The Sunday Times

“A strange, funny and delightful book ... perfectly captured by Polly Dunbar’s illustrations.”

Books for Keeps

“[Dunbar is] a newcomer of real talent.”

Classic FM

Other books by David Almond

Mouse Bird Snake Wolf

Slog's Dad

The Boy Who Climbed Into the Moon

The Boy Who Swam with Piranhas

The Savage

Also for older readers

A Song for Ella Grey

Clay

Counting Stars

Half a Creature from the Sea

Heaven Eyes

Jackdaw Summer

Kit's Wilderness

My Name is Mina

Secret Heart

Skellig

The Fire-Eaters

The Tightrope Walkers

The True Tale of the Monster Billy Dean

My Dad's a BIRDMAN

DAVID ALMOND

Illustrated by POLLY DUNBAR

WALKER
BOOKS

My Dad's a Birdman started life as a play. It was first performed at the Young Vic in December 2003.

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or, if real, are used fictitiously.

First published 2007 by Walker Books Ltd
87 Vauxhall Walk, London SE11 5HJ

This edition published 2015

2 4 6 8 10 9 7 5 3 1

Text © 2007 David Almond
Illustrations © 2007 Polly Dunbar

The right of David Almond and Polly Dunbar to be identified as author and illustrator respectively of this work has been asserted by them in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988

This book has been typeset in Caslon

Printed in Great Britain by Clays Ltd, St Ives plc

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, transmitted or stored in an information retrieval system in any form or by any means, graphic, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, taping and recording, without prior written permission from the publisher.

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data:
a catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

ISBN 978-1-4063-5440-9

www.walker.co.uk

For Freya, and for David Lan

D. A.

For my dad

P. D.

I

An ordinary spring morning in 12 Lark Lane. The birds were tweeting and whistling outside. The city traffic rumbled and roared. Lizzie's alarm went ringadingding. She jumped out of bed, washed her face, scrubbed behind her ears, brushed her teeth, brushed her hair, put on her uniform, went downstairs, filled the kettle, switched it on, put bread in the toaster, set the table with two plates, two mugs, two knives, milk and butter and jam, then she went to the foot of the stairs.

"Dad!" she shouted. "Daddy!"

No answer.

“Dad! Time to get up!”

No answer.

“If you don’t get up now, I’ll come up there and...”

She stepped heavily onto the first step, then onto the second step.

“I’m on me way!” she shouted.

She heard a grunt and a groan, then nothing.

“I’ll count to five. One ... two ... two and a half... Daddy!”

There was a muffled shout from upstairs.

“Oriyt, Lizzie! Oriyt!”

There was a crash and another groan, then there he was, in a scruffy dressing-gown and his hair all wild and his face all hairy.

“Downstairs now,” said Lizzie.

He stumbled down.

“And don’t look at me like that.”

“No, Lizzie.”

She tugged the dressing-gown straight on his shoulders.

“Look at the state of you,” she said. “What on earth have you been doing up there?”

He grinned.

“Been dreaming,” he said.

“Dreaming! What a man. Now sit at the table. Sit up straight.”

“Yes, Lizzie.”

He sat down on the edge of a chair. His eyes were shining and excited. Lizzie poured him a mug of tea. “Drink this,” she said, and he took a little sip. “And eat that toast.” He nibbled at a corner of the toast. “Eat it properly, Dad.” He took a bigger bite. “And chew it,” she said. He chewed for a moment. “And swallow it, Dad.”

He grinned. “Yes, Lizzie.” He took a big bite, chewed, swallowed, and he opened his mouth wide for her to look inside.

“All gone,” he said. “See?”

She clicked her tongue and turned her eyes away. “Don’t be silly, Dad,” she said. Then she smoothed his hair down and brushed it. She straightened the collar of his pyjama jacket. She felt the thick stubble on his chin.

“You’ve got to look after yourself,” she said. “You can’t go on the way you are. Can you?”

He shook his head.

“No, Lizzie,” he answered. “Certainly not, Lizzie.”

“I want you to have a shower and a shave today and to get properly dressed.”

“Yes, Lizzie.”

“Good. And what plans have you got for today?”

He sat up straight and looked her in the eye.

“I’m going to fly, Lizzie. Just like a bird.”

Lizzie rolled her eyes.

“Are you now?” she said.

“Yes, I am. And I’m going to enter the competition.”

“Competition? What competition?”

He laughed and leaned forward and held her arm.

“The Great Human Bird Competition, of course! Have you not heard about it? It’s coming to town! I heard about it yesterday. No, the day before yesterday. Or that day a week gone last Tuesday. Anyway, the first one to fly across the River Tyne wins a thousand pounds. And I’m going to enter. It’s true, Lizzie. It’s really true. I’m going to win! I’m going to make me mark at last.”

He stood up and held his arms out straight and flapped them.

“Are me feet off the floor?” he asked. “Are they? Are me feet off the floor?”

He ran and flapped, like he was flying.

“Oh, Dad,” said Lizzie. “Don’t be silly.”

She ran after him. He led her round and round the room. She caught up with him at last, and smoothed his hair down again and straightened his dressing-gown.

“OK,” she said. “Mebbe you are going to fly like a bird, but make sure you get some fresh air and get a good lunch inside you. OK?”

He nodded. “OK, Lizzie,” he said, and then he flapped again and giggled.

“Oh, and Auntie Doreen said she might pop round today.”

That stopped Dad in his tracks. His face crashed.

“Auntie Doreen?” he said.

He twisted his face and sighed.

“Not her again!”

“Yes, her again. She’ll bring you down to earth.”

He stamped his left foot. He stamped his right foot.

“But Lizzie...” he groaned.

“Never mind But Lizzie,” said Lizzie. “Auntie Doreen loves you, just like I do. And she worries about you, just like I do. So be nice to her.”

His shoulders drooped and his arms dangled by his side. Lizzie got her school bag, then kissed his cheek. She smiled gently and shook her head. He was just like a little boy standing there.

“What am I going to do with you?” she said.

“Don’t know, Lizzie,” he muttered.

She hesitated.

“I don’t know if I should leave you on your own.”

He laughed at her.

“Course you should,” he said. “You got to go to school and do your sums and your spellings.”

He was right. She did need to go to school. She liked school. She liked her sums and her spellings and her teachers, and she liked her head teacher, Mr Mint, who had been so kind to her and to her dad.

“All right,” she said. “I’ll go. Now give me a kiss bye-bye.”

He kissed her cheek. They hugged each other. She held her finger up.

“Now remember,” she said.

“Yes, Lizzie. I’ll remember. Wash. Shave. Get a good lunch. Get lots of fresh air. And be nice to Auntie D.”

“Good. That’s right.”

“And I’ll remember to fly.”

“Oh, Dad.”

He put his hand to her back and guided her towards the door.

“Go on,” he told her. “You haven’t a thing to worry about. Off you go to your lovely school.”

She opened the door and stepped out into the garden. She peered at him.

“Bye-bye,” he said.

“Bye-bye, Dad.”

She walked away down the garden and through the garden gate and into the street outside. She stood there for a moment, and looked back at him. “Go on,” said Dad. “I’m fine.” She set off walking again. He waved until she was out of sight, then he closed the door. He flapped his arms and started giggling.

“Tweet tweet,” he said. He poked a piece of toast out from under his tongue. He spat it out. “Tweet tweet,” he said. “Tweet tweet, tweet tweet.” Then he saw a fly crawling on the table.

“Yum yum,” he said, and he set off after it.